

ABSTRACT

Energy security became an international issue of world politics when the industrial countries struggled to secure their domestic energy supplies. It became the problem because the countries have no ability to fulfill their energy needed from their own energy resources. Import policy became a main policy that industrial countries made in order to secure their energy supply. This policy gives only a little advantage for the national energy security when there was many risk. The risk is such as the political instability of export countries and there was so many tanker accident.

Strategic petroleum reserve (SPR) became a good solution to solve the problem of energy import. This policy has a purpose to keep oil in oil barge. The effect of SPR influenced the relation between export and import countries, that in this case is between China and Indonesia. The SPR of China has given an impact of Indonesia energy sector. The impact could be seen from the investment of China state owned enterprises such as CNPC, CNOOC, and Sinopec in Indonesia energy Sector.
